PERSONAL CHARACTERISTICS Men who make their mark in their generation, and exercise a wide or lasting influence upon their contemporaries, do so either by their deeds, or by their words, or by their personal qualities. Their deeds and their words live after them, or may do so, but the inspiration and the charm of a commanding or an engaging personality follows him who possessed it to the grave, or lives only in the memories of those who had the advantage of enjoying his friendship and familiar presence. Dr. Harper was essentially a man of action, and I have tried hitherto to give some account of what he did. What he said is of less importance. He was not naturally eloquent, in the ordinary acceptation of the term: indeed, his words may be said to have partaken ordinarily more of the nature of actions than of utterances, and he left behind him singularly few letters, and those rarely of anything but private or temporary interest. It remains to attempt to describe what sort of a man he was in himself, and what it was in him which inspired such genuine affection and esteem in the hearts of friends of the most varied characters and positions in life. Nature had bestowed on him, in an eminent degree, the blessings of a sound body, a sound mind, and a sound heart. Here was, in a word, the secret of his power. There was no...
