Excerpt: . . . of their ride, if possible, the whole party now set off on an exploring expedition. after their runaway team. A search of two hours brought them no nearer to their object, and they were obliged to return home (distant about two miles) kiteless, though with an appetite much sharpened. On the following day they once more set forward upon their voyage of discovery, and were fortunate enough to succeed in recovering their flighty steeds. Meanwhile, a singular adventure had been the consequence, giving rise to most laughable results. After soaring through the air for upwards of a mile, the Kites finally lodged upon the roof of a house, the ballast, tail, and cordage, hanging down to the ground. About midnight, the people within, were awakened by strange noises-----which presently became louder and louder. A Alarm soon spread throughout the familyl-robbers must be about the premises. Now the noise increases--the wholehouse is on the alert, and swords and guns are brought into requisition. They patrol the circuit of the building, and one of the party falls in with a line hanging down from the parapet; by this way, then, the robbers have entered, and their hammering is distinctly heard on the roof of the house. Hither then, all courageously repair, and make a grand rush upon the leads. Here the alarming mystery is disclosed, and nothing but a harmless Kite is seen flapping its wings against the roof. So much valour, perhaps, has never been...
