Not illustrated. 1828 Excerpt: . . . these projecting lateral portions cross the pupil and fold over one another, but do not adhere together; although this is the usual state of the iris, it admits of variation, for in some specimens these lateral projections had receded sufficiently to render the pupil of an oval form and single; it is therefore probable that the iris can so enlarge the pupil as to make it of considerable size, forming a pyramidal oval, large above and small below, while at other times it covers the middle space, and leaves only two apertures for light to come to the crystalline lens, the uppermost the largest. That vision can only be carried on while the pupil is thus made double, there can be no doubt, since the crystalline lens instead of being spherical is not even circular, having a small projection at the lower edge, directly behind the...
